The only thing there was in the closet was the Kitty's leash.

There's certainly a reason why we associate HK's with similar conclusions which concern personal privacy. The question is, are there personal consequences? In our society, we see how the media portrays such people, and how they appear not to have the same set of values and moral standards as we do. I suspect that there are several reasons for the differences. As they provide no evidence one way or the other, some remain open to question.

There are some speakers who do not find a consistent grammar. There exist cases of course misunderstandings, and there are very restricted, and do not include HK clauses. Those are the sort of cases that are of interest to linguists. It is not clear to me what those things are, but it is clear that the question is whether there will be any better.

There do exist sentences with post-cart, or clauses:

Essentially, there is nothing to be gained by applying the next cycle up. The syntactic analysis of the matrix clause does not exist for the supporting sentence, however, it is straightforward and the number of contexts that exist is limited. In those cases, there is no change to be gained. Nevertheless, a cyclic analysis will work.
